

The Race, Class, and Gender Bias of the American Justice System: A Study of California's Three Strikes Law

This text offers new insight into the intersection of mass media's crime coverage and its influence on readers. This work focuses on possible ideal type depictions of crime, criminals, and victims in print media. It presents a two-year content analysis of US News & World Report, The Los Angeles Times, and The Washington Post. It concludes that the media reinforced race, class, and gender-based fears of African Americans, the poor, males, and single individuals.
