

All the Tea

In the new millennium, two nations have emerged from the Cold War as the pre-eminent superpowers: the United States and China. Over the last ten years, the Japanese and the Americans have worked in secret on the remote island of Senkaku to perfect the processes of initiating and controlling a nuclear fusion reaction that will produce clean and abundant electricity.

The story begins when a Chinese spy, after discovering classified documents describing the fusion project, shoots his way out of a Japanese government office building. Although this agent meets his demise, his handlers now know the importance of the find. The U.S. Department of Energy sends the projects Executive Sponsor, Dr. Marcia Hobson, to Senkaku to shut down the project when it appears that its secrecy has been compromised. Hobson, an African American widow and mother, must cancel a Spring Break ski trip with her troubled son in order to make the journey. She elects to bring the teen-ager along. Meanwhile, Chinese operatives prepare to act. Navy Reservist Commander Ben McGuire is serving out his annual two-week hitch aboard the Seventh Fleet Commanders flagship a few hundred miles away in the Sea of Japan when things heat up. Without disclosing any details, the President directs the Navy to evacuate the scientists from the island. Thinking it a low priority issue, Navy officials dispatch the Reservist to run the mission. Ben does not realize the island laboratorys importance nor is he aware that another spy has infiltrated the scientists. Events on the island will not only reunite him with an old love interest but also place him in a position to affect the balance of power between the U.S. and China for years to come.
